About 1897, he moved Darke County Ohio, located on the Ohio-Indiana border. Lucullus continued farming and raising cattle and ran an Indian Artifacts Trading center. It was reported that his dream of settling near Native Americans never wavered. He and family and moved to the Washington's Yakima River Valley in 1902. That move could not have been a "spur of the moment decision because it involved moving not only his wife, three children and household belongings, but also his registered Devon cattle, seeds or starter plants of almost every variety.

He purchased a 30 acre tract of unfenced lush farmland started a new life. Several Indian tribes lived nearby, which including Yakima and Nez Perce. He continued raising his Devon cattle. That herd was the progenitor of all the Devon cattle in the northwest. His cattle were shown in cattle shows all along the Washington and Oregon coast including the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition in Portland 1905.

He permitted Indian tribes to camp on his property when they were the area and became friends with both the Nez Perce and Yakima. A few years later he was taken into the Yakima tribe given the Indian name of "Bigfoot." The Nez Perce adopted him into their tribe and gave him the name of "He-Mene-Ka.Wan" or "Old Wolf."

Lucullus Virgil McWhorter, without benefit of much formal education, is a frequently recognized author of historical documents in America. "Border Settlers of Northwestern Virginia" is his most recognized work. That, first published in 1915, has been reprinted at least five times.
